There are many ways to approach learning Photoshop. Each person has their own learning style, and different ways of learning that work for one person may not work for another. My suggestions are geared to a student who wants to develop skills in creating and editing digital images. The following sections describe these different ways of learning and some related topics. Getting ready to make an image Photoshop has a powerful feature-set built-in. You can easily bring in a photograph, a drawing, a scanned photo, or anything else you want to use as an image. With the image open in Photoshop, you can go to the File menu and then choose New. In the New dialog box, you can choose from the following options: File Type: You can choose the different file types. JPEG files are universal and work in most programs. However, if you plan to print your images for others to see, the best format to choose is the TIFF file. TIFF files have extra image information that lets them print as well as display in a computer monitor, but they don't support as many editing programs as JPEG files. If you do go with a TIFF file for your image, you can convert it from Photoshop into another editing program later if you choose. Resolution: You can choose between several different resolutions, which determines what size the image will be when you save it. At the highest setting, you save the final image at the native resolution of the photo or drawing you're scanning. This is also the most time-consuming option, so it's suggested that you work with a lower resolution (such as 72 dpi or 300 dpi) to speed up the editing process. Size: Here you choose a size for the image. For the larger sizes, you can crop and resize the image, and by reducing the size, you can create thumbnails that show more detail. Encoding: You can choose between the JPEG and PSD formats for saving your image. Most of the time, I use JPEGs, but if I had a large file that I intended to use in more than one place in a web page or publication, I save it as a PSD. You can save as a project. This option creates a template that allows you to save as many versions of the image as you want. Creating an image: You can just open an image in Photoshop and go about your business. If you want to tweak some features in the image, such as text and might not know that they are sharing. Keep in mind that photo rentals will cost you in terms of convenience. So if you are only planning on using the shared prints once or twice, you might have no need to use the camera at all. But if you are a serious photographer who shoots a lot, this might be a deal-breaker. How to Protect Yourself Let's be honest: Part of the fun of sharing pictures on the web is the ability to turn the lens your friends use. And the ability to use a tool that you use every single day. While learning the ropes of what is and isn't allowed is an important part of your safety as a photographer, that's really just it. There's much more to keep you safe, and in this section, we'll explore some of the big things that you should keep in mind. Know the Exposure The exposure settings on your camera are the key to making sure you're getting the correct exposure. There are different settings depending on the environment you're shooting in: lights, darkness, and more. Knowing what each setting will look like in each environment will help you make sure you're not under or overexposing your pictures. Start by taking a test shot. The best way to do this is by using your camera's self-timer; take a shot and then after about ten seconds, open the camera back up. What you'll see are the settings for each of the settings. This should tell you a lot about the exposure that will be in your final picture and how you need to fine-tune your exposure settings. Protect Your Gear In addition to knowing what your camera's settings are, we can't stress enough how important it is that you know what gear you are using. This is especially important when you share your shots online. While it's tempting to go out and get cool accessories for your trip, that's something you can do when you're a pro. The key to staying safe is to always use the right gear for the job. This means that if you're going to share your pictures online, use equipment that is safe. Using the right equipment for the job will make sure you are always safe as a photographer. For example, if you're going to use a tripod, make sure it's equipped with a built-
